For the 6 classes I'm taking this semester, 5 of them are already online (which are major blessings already because that's 14 hours a week I'm saving because I don't have to be in class), so my experience has not changed that much already. However, my only in-person class happens to be my math class, in which I used to get lots of help in person in the AAC. That is the one I'm worried most about, as I will no longer have much opportunity for face to face learning. I figure I will struggle most there and I will just have to weather out the storm and possibly get lower grades due to this, but it's not the end of the world. I enjoy that I'm at home because I now have more time to spend doing homework because of no commute, and I just have less distractions so I can spend more time reading a book and relaxing. I am already slightly introverted so I don't mind spending lots of time at home.
